

Homeschool Humor

You know you're homeschooling when:

- You can't begin the morning's lesson because the cat is lying on your lesson plans.
- You start thinking about pronouncing words according to phonics rules instead of how they're really pronounced.
- Your table (or floor) is so covered with books that you can't see the surface.
- Your son's middle school church friends are "jealous" because they hear he's done with school by lunchtime!
- When asked to spell your name for a healthcare professional, you start to say, "Capital...." (I can't count how many times I've done that!)
- Your son's report card is warped (before he even sees it) because the cat threw up on it. (So much for an "organized office"! ☺)
- Your natural response to "where do your kids go to school" is "They're homeschooled, but they_____ (add in all the activities that "prove" to strangers that your kids are 'socialized'!)"
- Your kids are used to impromptu recesses in the middle of a lesson because the bread is done baking, the UPS guy comes with the package, the baby needs to be changed, or the phone rings (or all four at once)!!
- You hear your five-year-old asking the baby, "Can you say 'a in apple'?"
- Your kids help each other with their homework.
- You wonder how much of time at Grandma's (when Grandma shows the kids neat stuff outdoors) you can count for science!
- You learn about countries you never knew existed.
- Your kids "go to school" in their PJs on occasion (& so do you!)
- Your kids have so much time for Legos that the Legos take over your house!